

Essay:

Are the Spanish schools in the death line?

First of all, I would like to remark that in Spain there are two kind of school: the public school and the private one. The public school is in troubles.

As far as I am concerned, it is a fact that the average of educational level is getting down every season. It is so because we use to measure different aseptic parameters like: the number of children who leave the secondary school, the percentage of pupils who reach to the University, the low numbers of applications for the professional school and so on. But we also would introduce new parameters, as the fact that the compulsory school nowadays takes two more years than in the past, the fact that in many cases both parents work out home or the fact that there are more number of immigrants in the schools.

There is another side to the issue that we should fix at home. If we challenge the kids to get good marks we encourage them to make an extra-effort. Not only we should change, but the school should change its goals. It has to reward the hard-worker and the system has to punish the lazy. It has to build good students not passing the exams to everyone.

By all these reason gave before, we cannot say that the public school is in the death line. I accept the decreasing level in the Spanish school's rates, but in contrast I state that the technical equipment and the teacher's skills have improved for the last twenty years. The future universities will succeed in their careers more than our generation did.

Good effort. More work is needed, however, on vocabulary and sentence construction. You should also look at the use of prepositions and try to avoid the use of 'false friends'. SLP2
