

ESSAY EXERCISE

Recent surveys reveal that the Spanish education system has dropped in the last few years. In this essay I will try to analyze the roots of the problem, but in fact, it is too difficult topic.

To begin with, I agree with the assessment about the Spanish schools. I consider the students need more attention from their parents. They have to spend more time to help their children in anything. This is a kind of lack of core values such as respect, discipline and responsibility; it is supposed to be passed down by their parents. The excessively permissive provides children without ethical values. These aspects undermine the standard education in any case.

The aforementioned leads us to think that, the government should have granted families financial help until the children are eighteen years old; this measure would have avoided parents looking for another job, so they would have spent more time with their children, in order to prevent the lack of core values, that I have mentioned before. The authority of parents, teachers and educators in general is the logical consequence of the responsibility application. They have not to allow children to do whatever they want. Is not easy to reach the perfect balance between extreme authority and permissiveness, in fact, if we let the children live without rules, not only they are going to decrease their academic performance, in addition to that, we will have irresponsible citizens for next generations.

From my point of view, Spanish education system is a failure, this is the truth. It is not time for regrets, but it is time for changing the current law for the benefit of our children. I am concerned that some of this measure could be very expensive and difficult to implement, but I strongly believe that investing in education means investing in our social welfare. It's well worth the risk.

Good attempt-although it's important to try to stay within the word-limit: 250 words +/-10 %.You have gone slightly over this. Pay attention to the definite article-when to use it and when not to, and also try to avoid very long sentences-these are not as common in English as they are in Spanish.SLP 2+
